PREFACE.

PREFACE

THE present volume contains what remains of the Exchequer Rolls, the rentals of crown lands, and the Books of Responde for the nine years from 1580 to 1588. Save for the deficiency of comptrollers' accounts, to be afterwards referred to, the series is fairly complete; and, besides the accounts of comptrollers, chamberlains, custumars, and bailies of burghs, like those which have formed the material of the previous volumes of this series, the volume contains a roll of sheriffs' accounts, belonging to the year 1580. The preserved accounts of sheriffs are few, the last one hitherto printed belonging to the year 1501.[1] The matters usually specified in these documents are to some extent contained also in the Responde Books, and in this volume advantage has been taken of this concurrence to abridge the respondes which repeat the information of the sheriffs' accounts. The roll, for the rest, is valuable for particulars, such as the names of the various sheriffs, not given in the respondes.

There are accounts of the bailies ad extra for seven of these nine years, none remaining for the years 1580 and 1581; but two separate rolls of accounts of these officers occur for 1582, many of the reckonings in which go back beyond the usual annual period.

The series of accounts of custumars and bailies of burghs is continuous and complete, except that there is no roll for the year 1583. Several of the accounts for 1584, however, go back over two years. It is noteworthy that the older practice of having separate accounts for each of the custumars is superseded in the rolls from 1585 onwards, the separate accounts being now represented by one general account. The reason of the change appears on the face of these general accounts, which bear to be those of the lessees of the great custom of the kingdom of Scotland under a royal tack of March 1582;[1] and is more fully set out in a copy of the tack itself, to be afterwards considered.

The Appendix includes, in the first place, the rentals of the crown lands for the years from 1580 to 1588. Then come the Books of Responde for the same period. These exist, and are here printed, in an unbroken series down to 1587. The book for 1588 is wanting, but some indication of its contents is given in the volume of Indices Responsionum in Capella Regia which has already been drawn upon in making up former volumes of the rolls, and of which the entries for 1588 are now brought in. The third part of the Appendix is occupied by miscellaneous documents, chiefly minutes of proceedings in Exchequer, which are found written on the blank leaves at the end of the various Books of Responde, and are bound up along with them in the records.

I.

The only noticeable deficiency in the extant rolls relating to this period is in the comptrollers' accounts, for there are no more than two of these in the present volume, one for 1580, the other for 1588. What remains, however, is enough to attest that the business of Exchequer went on with greater regularity than in the earlier years of King James's reign; and, indeed, that, whether owing to the personal parsimoniousness which historians have ascribed to this monarch, or to the probability that his riper age brought with it a stricter oversight of his officers and a nicer consideration of financial policy, greater diligence was exercised in bringing in the royal revenues and furnishing the king's house. The comptroller of the prior years, Sir William Murray of Tulibardin, remained in office until 1582,[1] for part of which year the name of the comptroller's clerk, John Fenton, occurs with the simple designation, comptroller.[2] Then Sir James Campbell of Ardkinglas was appointed.[1] He acted in 1583 and 1584, but in the accounts for 1585 his name occurs as that of the "former comptroller,[2] the signature of the clerk, John Fenton, being taken to witness the payments to the principal officer. In 1586 and 1587 the comptroller is Sir Andrew Wood of Largo;[3] while in 1588 the office is held by Sir John Seton of Barns.[4] In the lack of comptrollers' accounts less material remains than in foregoing periods for making up a list of the lords auditors. Of the two comptrollers' accounts given in the present volume only one contains the usual sederunt of lords auditors present when the account was rendered. It is for 1580, and enumerates eighteen names.[5] Full lists for the other years are absent, but occasionally a sederunt is specified in the notes of minutes of proceedings preserved in the Responde Books,[6] one of which sets forth, besides, how on the 2nd of August 1587 the lords auditors chose Master John Lindsay, parson of Menmur, and in his absence James Meldrum of Segy, to be their president.[7] The year 1587 brought with it the act of annexation to the crown of the temporalities of ecclesiastical benefices, and the king's general revocation of all the alienations of the crown property made during his minority; for he reached the age of twenty-one on the 19th

June of that year. The royal majority was doubtless also the occasion of the act of 1587 anent the chekker. By this measure the sittings were fixed to extend from 1st July to 31st August in each year. The usual diligence against accountants neglecting to appear and render their accounts was strengthened.[1] Still another statute of the same year defined the obligations of the comptroller, and enjoined him to render his account before 1st September yearly.[2]

These measures exhibit the regulation of the Exchequer by a stricter statement of the duties of the fiscal officers. A large number of the documents preserved in the Responde Books show how the same purpose was served by taking special care to assure the pecuniary sufficiency of the local fiduciaries in the areas of revenue remoter from the centre of government. The documents in question are either drafts or copies of minutes of proceedings in Exchequer, and the most frequent piece of business which they put into writing is the finding of surety by the various officers charged with the collection of the revenues of the crown. In times of prosperity and settled administration, such collectors would render their accounts regularly enough; and hitherto, when irregularities arose, the practice of the lords auditors had been simply to await the customary term for rendering the various accounts, and, if they were not then presented in Exchequer, to charge the defaulting chamberlain or receiver under the penalties of horning and outlawry. But now, whether the fact be due to the personal character of the King or to some alarming growth of negligence in the accountants, the constant recurrence of these cautionary obligations suggests with convincing force that the sovereign and his fiscal advisers had framed a special policy to meet the needs of the situation. Accordingly the practice grew of regarding the various collectors less as officers of than as debtors to the crown, and of exacting from them, while giving them some little time to meet their engagements, a surety that the payment would be made within a specified period after the term. The common form of these obligations is that a burgess of Edinburgh appears and undertakes to be cautioner for the payment of the maills or other dues to the comptroller or his clerk. As a rule, the principal debtor binds himself to relieve the cautioner, but the crown has thus a double recourse. Not a few of the obligations relate to the payment of the portions due originally to nuns or monks of the old ecclesiastical foundations, which would have been paid to them in pre-Reformation times, and to the donataries of the church property in the days immediately before the annexation of the church lands to the crown. They illustrate the difficulty experienced by the crown in enforcing on the nobility who had grants of the church lands the obligations of the statute.

In general the cautioners are burgesses of Edinburgh, and mostly merchants, facts which indicate how important the commercial classes were becoming to the State when their credit had to be brought in as a customary part of the machinery for collecting the crown revenues. How the practice grew up is shown in the documents transcribed or abridged in the Appendix.[1] In the year 1587 the custom became law, for then an act was passed which ordained that "no chamberlain or receiver of the king's rent removable be received by the comptroller but such as finds sureties to the comptroller in Edinburgh to mak compt in the ordiner time of the chekker and to mak payment within twenty days after ilk term."[2] A further provision of the same statute enacted that hereditary chamberlains, as well as those removable, should find surety to the same effect.

While these papers show the legal means taken by the crown to bring in money to its coffers, it appears from others that the comptroller and his officers sometimes overstrained their powers. Thus a document preserved among the minutes for the year 1585 gives a petition to the lords auditors by the vicar of Cupar-Fife, setting forth that he had been preferred to the vicarage by the Regent Murray, who, as commendator of the priory of St. Andrews, was the proper patron at the time of the appointment, which, besides, had been confirmed by the King. His benefice amounted to £30 a year, and he had paid the assumed third to the comptroller ever since his appointment; but in 1584 the comptroller had charged him to pay the whole £30. In these circumstances he appealed to the lords auditors, who, having found his claim good, discharged him from any further payment than that of the third.[1]

II.

The collection of the revenues from the crown lands, for the rest, appears to have gone on without any other noticeable alteration in the practice. The case was different in regard to the customs. These dues must have been a steadier source of revenue, as is shown by the use that was made of them in the financial arrangements of this period. The king had many difficulties in supplying the coinage during these years;[2] and an attempt was made to draw through the machinery of the customs a supply of the material of money to the mint. An act was passed in 1581 providing that every custumar and clerk of cocket was to take surety that bullion equivalent to the goods transported furth of the realm should be delivered to the master of the mint before the Exchequer was held; and that the comptroller was to be answerable and to supervise the accounts.[3] This was the year in which a certain Thomas Rorestoun was forfeited for false coining;[1] and it is interesting in this connection to note the appearance, under the date 1584, among the commissions of justiciary preserved in the Books of Responde, of one relating to this crime. Under this commission, which was granted at Falkland on 18th June 1584, the Master of Elphinstone, Sir Walter Ogilvy of Findlater, Sir George Ogilvy of Dunlugus, and some others were appointed justiciars to cite, accuse, and try Master Duncan Forbes of Monymusk as suspected of the treasonable devising, coining, and uttering of false and counterfeited money.[2] Offences against the coin come up rarely in the records of this time; and it is not unnatural to suppose that they may have been occasioned by such measures as the act last mentioned and by the royal proclamations which endeavoured to force the precious metals of the country into the mint. This suggestion is all the more likely since in 1587 another act was passed under which a royal commission was appointed to fix "what duty of bullion his highness ought to have brought to his Cunzehous for all manner of goods customable passand furth of this realm."[3] The older statute had made the whole of the customable goods available as supplying bullion, and had clearly not been found workable. It is accordingly not surprising to find that the custumars' accounts in the rolls bear no trace of the direction to furnish bullion to the mint.

It is further evident from the accounts themselves, as well as from the statutes and the minutes of proceedings in Exchequer, that in these years considerable difficulty was felt in getting in the customs. Thus in 1581 the customs of Aberdeen had been unaccounted for in Exchequer for nine years;[1] those of Irvine had in 1582 been similarly unreturned for eight years;[2] and in the same year those of Kirkcudbright had lain over for no less a time than twenty-six years.[3] The legislation of the time indicates that the ordinary difficulties of collection were aggravated by evasive devices on the part of exporters, which called for ever stricter vigilance on the part of the crown. Thus a statute of 1581, proceeding on the preamble that the customs are a part of the patrimony of the crown, and that "the custom shall now remain with the King for his living," enacted "that a table be delivered to all custumars for inbringing the customs, ordaining that every sack of wool shall contain only twenty-four stones, every hundred skins six score, and every dozen of cloth twelve ells allanerly."[4] So precise a provision would not have been necessary had it not been found in fact that the exporters were getting out more wool and other goods than had paid custom, and were resorting to the stratagem of setting a conventional meaning on the legal measures in order that the accounts might have at least a look of fairness. The act would prevent the evasion of the dues by deceptive accounting.

Embarrassed by these difficulties, the king resorted to the expedient of farming out the customs. The design was carried into effect by a tack of March 1582, a copy of which is preserved among the documents printed in the Appendix. Under this instrument the king, with consent of his comptroller, lets out the whole custom of the realm for five years to come. The grantees are the provosts, bailies, and councils of the various burghs, taking under the tack through six commissioners, namely, Alexander Clark, the provost, John Johnston and Henry Charteris, for Edinburgh; Dionysius Conqueror for Perth, Alexander Scrymgeour for Dundee, and Alexander Hay for Aberdeen, as representing both their own burghs and the others in Scotland. The local custumars, instead of being appointed by the comptroller, as hitherto, are to be appointed by the town councils, and are to charge the same customs as have been in use for the past forty years. A special tribunal is appointed to deal with such offences as extortion on the part of custumars. The commissioners are taken bound to pay into the Exchequer four thousand pounds each year, and to deliver to the king's butler thirty tuns of full Bordeaux wine.[1]

[1] See the tack itself, Appendix, p. 561.

The deed, besides, makes a particular provision that the commissioners shall, notwithstanding the tack, give in a yearly account of the customs "according to the consuetude observit of befoir"; but the absence of particular accounts of custumars from the rolls in question would seem to indicate that this stipulation was not adhered to. The commissioners would be unwilling to exhibit the details of their takings if it should appear from them that the king's bargain was turning out a bad one; for by this time King James was beginning to exercise that personal control of his fiscal policy which gained him the reputation of being too thrifty for a king.

The farming out of the customs did not release the crown from the obligation of enforcing their exaction; and documents occur among the minutes of proceedings which show how bonds of caution were used in the furtherance of this administrative work. There are two bonds of August 1582 under which burgesses of Edinburgh undertake in Exchequer to be surety for two traders in the Borders that these will appear in court and answer charges of exporting sheep and wool to England against the terms of the act of Parliament.[1]

The rolls which represent during the currency of the tack of the customs the formerly detailed series of custumars' accounts tell little more than that the stipulated price of four thousand pounds was regularly paid; and the statute-book is similarly reticent on this subject during this period. It is plain enough, however, from the nature of the subsequent legislation that the farming out of the customs had been productive of evils of its own. Thus one act of 1587 refers to the dearth then existing, and ascribes it to the levying of unlawful customs and impositions on victuals and goods coming to markets and free ports without warrant, and "whereof they have not been in use and custom past memory of man."[1] The act forbids the levying of such duties. The lessees of the customs have taken a large view of their powers and hindered the development of trade by imposing novel exactions.

Another statute of this year forbids the transportation of "vivers" furth of the kingdom, and appoints as searchers the wardens of the marches, while also ordering that all free burghs shall appoint other searchers in order that such goods be confiscated, half to the king's use and half to the use of the burghs or the wardens, as the case may be.[2]

Both these laws were probably immediately occasioned by the dearth, but they serve to illustrate the effect of the tack of the customs. A third statute of the same year takes a more general view of the situation, and confirms the suspicion that the farming of the customs had been fruitful of abuses. This act remits to the lords auditors to consider "what costly, superfluous, and unnecessary merchandise is commonly brought within this realm, and what profitable wares and commodities are carried furth of the same that aucht and suld pay custom to our sovran lord; and to sett and appoint what custom suld be payit thairfoir, having respect to the increase of the dearth." [1]

III.

The foregoing observations are suggested by the accounts of the chamberlains and of the custumars which are given in this volume. It remains to consider the comptrollers' accounts. There are no more than two preserved of these documents belonging to this period, one for 1580, the other for 1588. A comparison of the two accounts with one another and with the similar records printed in prior volumes of the Exchequer Rolls reveals two peculiar distinctions that are noteworthy as arresting attention on particular stages in the growth of the system of keeping the royal accounts. In the first place, these comptrollers' accounts are drawn in a form more nearly approaching that of a modern account than that of their predecessors. The roll has given place to the book, bound at the back, which is physically much more convenient to handle when reference has to be made to particular places; and there are changes in the formal structure of the account which exhibit one phase of the transition from the old to the new system of book-keeping. The older accounts engrossed upon parchment rolls were written out with the various items following directly one after another, the whole statement constituting one solid paragraph of writing without any interposition, decorative or utilitarian, of blank spaces, less regard being had to any such considerations as the convenience of a reader than to traditional and official formality and the mechanical safeguarding of the records against possible unauthorised interpolations. When, on the other hand, the accounts are drawn in book form, the various items are given as in a modern account, the figures that are be afterwards computed to a total being thrown out to the right-hand margin, so that the page as a whole shows a more nicely calculated display in the exhibition of its material, and arrives at an inchoate form of money column. Sometimes victual and money are mixed together, indeed, and the throwing out of the figures is not done with absolute strictness; but already the volume has the aspect of a modern book of account. Each page of entries is summed up, too; but the summations are in a different handwriting from that in which the body of the account is drawn, and there is no catchline of "Carry Forward" or "Brought Forward" to connect the successive columns, as in later systems of book-keeping. These summations of each written page, being nothing more than steps towards results fully set forth in the body of the documents, and presenting no special features of interest in themselves other than the formal ones just animadverted on, have not been reproduced in the printed pages which follow. While the written language of numerical reckoning is thus seen in progress towards a new economy of articulation, it is to be remembered that the accounts are still drawn in the records with Roman numeral letters instead of those so-called Arabic digits which are given in the printed pages as less cumbrous to work with and more easily intelligible to twentieth-century readers than the actual characters of the manuscripts. Should the metric system ever supersede the method of reckoning money observed at the present day, a kindred change of usage in the financial records of some period yet to come will unfold itself to the researches of the antiquaries of the future.

In the second place, the comptrollers' accounts given in this volume differ in their language. That for 1580 is, like the older accounts in the rolls, written in Latin; while that for 1588 employs as its medium of expression the vernacular Scots of those days. This old form of speech presents not a few points of interest to the philologer and to those enquirers who know what importance to assign to language as historical evidence of national advancement in civilisation. It is noteworthy both for its own idioms and as a rendering of the Latin terms and phrases of style used in the older accounts. The Latin diction of former years not unfrequently suggested the comment that the drafters or dictators of the accounts, when faced with any payment or receipt a little out of the habitual course of business, and puzzled how to draw up a properly stated record of the circumstances of the transaction, must have taken the Scots words or phrases most familiar to their ears and given them a merely specious resemblance to the idiom of Cicero. So, for example, the Scots phrase "winning the hay," meaning drying or seasoning the hay by exposing it to the wind, appears as "lucratio feni"[1]—words which suggest that their writer thought of the hay less as being aired and winnowed than as being converted into gains or winnings. A transitional stage of composition appears in entries in which the expression is bilingual, the drafter being apparently (to use a French by-word) at the end of his Latin, and unable to find any satisfactory Roman equivalent for the word in his mind. An instance occurs in the comptroller's account for 1580:—"Et eidem in quadraginta solidis pro LIE BOULLING patellarum cum ferro" (for putting iron handles on the dishes).

[1] Infra, p. 147.

Yet when the accounts come to be written wholly in the vernacular, the Latin influence still leaves distinctly visible traces, and entries occur bearing how a king's page has received so much "in contentation of his meat and drink," or how certain expenses are made "upoun the furnishing and sustentation of the king's grace' dogs."

These linguistic processes, for the rest, are visible in action whenever one language displaces another. Parallelisms like that in the phrase last quoted are frequent in the Book of Common Prayer, and, while piously admired by the devout, remind an historical enquirer of the Roman origin of the Anglican liturgy. Yet the adoption of a vulgar in place of a learned tongue in writings influenced by tendencies so formal and so conservative as those which dictate accounts of exchequer may be taken as the high-water-mark of that tide of reformation in speech which began to flow when the Bible was first done out of the Vulgate into terms understood by common people. The Scots which now comes into the accounts, a sturdy Lallan, the accents of which fall softly upon local ears, never rose to the dignity of a paramount language of independent vitality and incalculable expansiveness; but it had a life of its own, enough of which remains in the accounts to make them less hard reading than the crabbed, contracted, and abbreviated record Latin which it now replaces. The older speech, indeed, took on some organic qualities from the vernacular throughout, as a stone may clothe itself in lichens, mosses, and the like low forms of vegetation; and the Latin of the rolls exhibits some of the characteristics which philology assigns to every speech in its development from an inflectional to an analytical stage. Thus the unchanging order of the words in the accounts renders many of the Latin case-endings superfluous and redundant, and they are dropped by way of abbreviation in the manuscript, although they are extended in the print for the reader's convenience. But when the Scots comes in, a reader of the documents may well feel as if he were enlarged from school into the open air. The written letter, so much rusty ink on dusty sheepskin or faded paper, seems still to yield the echo of a living voice.
